Child's Lesson is one of Frans van Mieris's early works, probably painted around 1657.^[1] In this evocative painting, a young mother tenderly holding her son's hand looks up at a kindly old man holding a book close to his side. Van Mieris situated the three figures in a darkened interior before a brick arch. The dim light passing through the leaded-glass windows in a back room reveals a wooden flight of steps winding to the left, but all of the visual attention rests on the three figures. The attractive woman, who wears a black headscarf, is dressed fashionably in a bluish-purple skirt and a gold-colored upper garment with décolletage.^[2] Her blond son, dressed in a buttoned jerkin, has laid the book he is reading on his mother's lap beside his plumed cap. The refined rendering of these garments and feathers displays the Leiden artist's great virtuosity even at this early period of his career.^[3]

Depictions of women and children in domestic interiors are frequently found in Dutch art.^[4] The most direct prototype for Child's Lesson is an engaging painting by Gerard ter Borch (1617–81), The Reading Lesson, ca. 1652 (fig 1), which is one of a number of Ter Borch's paintings that inspired Van Mieris at various stages of his career.^[5] In both paintings the mother is seen in profile while her son, with long flowing locks, reads from a book in her lap. As in this instance, Ter Borch seems to have helped Van Mieris develop his narrative style to convey a sense of emotional intimacy between figures, which would become a hallmark of his mature style.

The motif of a mother teaching her children is rooted in allegorical images of Grammar, one of the seven liberal arts.^[6] Sixteenth-century prints, such as those made by Cornelis Drebbel after Hendrick Goltzius (1558–1617) (fig 2), helped spread this motif to Dutch painters, who translated it into a more contemporary context.^[8] As in Drebbel's print after Goltzius, a man is present in Van Mieris's Child's Lesson. With his advanced years, beard, brown coat and book, he exhibits all the characteristics of a scholar. Perhaps he is a teacher who has come to give the boy extra instruction and is smiling approvingly because he has found the mother giving her son reading lessons.^[9] The elderly man also serves a visual counterpoint to the elegant mother, with her smooth skin, and her young son, providing the artist the opportunity to contrast the differing ages of the three figures.

Van Mieris's painting has, with good reason, been linked to the Old Testament story of Hannah (I Samuel 1:24–28). Hannah was not able to conceive a child until she had prayed for a son and promised to relinquish him to the priesthood. It has been argued that Van Mieris depicted the moment at which Hannah entrusted her son Samuel into the care of the high priest Eli.^[9] This interpretation would certainly explain the meaningful gaze exchanged between the woman and the old man, as well as his attire, which seems to be rather old-fashioned.

Van Mieris did occasionally paint history scenes in his later years, such as Death of Lucretia from 1679 (see FM-103). Much like his friend Jan Steen (1625/26–79), he often situated these scenes in seventeenth-century domestic settings, as in his Jeroboam's Wife with the Prophet Ahijah, 1671, a scene from the Old Testament (fig 3).^[10] Even though Van Mieris did not situate the figures in a temple, as did other painters from the Dutch Golden Age who portrayed Hannah entrusting her son Samuel to Eli, it is likely that the Leiden master was inspired by this biblical story in rendering this intimate scene.^[11]

Endnotes

1. This dating was proposed verbally in 2005 to the author by Naumann, who had previously dated it to circa 1662–63 (Otto Naumann, Frans van Mieris (1635–1681) the Elder, 2 vols. [Doornspijk, 1981], 1:66, 2:61). Plietzsch had already proposed an earlier dating (Eduard Plietzsch, Holländische und flämische Maler des 17. Jahrhunderts [Leipzig, 1960], 53).
2. The dress is comparable to that worn by the sitter of A Woman Holding a Black Feather (Portrait of Cunera van der Cock), datable to 1658–60, in Öffentliche Kunstsammlung, Kunstmuseum, Basel (Otto Naumann, Frans van Mieris (1635–1681) the Elder, 2 vols. - From whom acquired by the present owner in 2004.

Provenance Notes

1. A seal on the back of the panel still attests to this prestigious provenance. For the Moltke Collection, see Ben Broos, Intimacies and Intrigues: History Paintings in the Mauritshuis, The Hague, 1993, 98–99, with numerous references. The number “86” on the back of the panel refers to the 1931 sale of the Moltke Collection in Copenhagen, see Provenance. Portrait of a Fifty-Two-Year Old Man (FM-104) also comes from the Moltke Collection.

Technical Summary

The support, a single plank of vertically grained, rectangular wedge-shaped oak with an arched upper edge, has bevels along all four sides and a shim glued to the lower edge.^[1] The panel is unthinned and uncradled and appears to have been trimmed slightly along the left vertical edge. Along the panel reverse there is one red wax collection seal, two old paper labels, and a numerical inscription but no import stamps, panel maker's mark or machine tool marks.

A white-colored ground was applied followed by a brown transparent underlayer used as a mid-tone, particularly through the man's and boy's faces, jackets, and hair and shadows of the woman's blue skirt. Infrared images captured at 1700 nanometers reveal a loose and fluid sketch roughly outlining forms and defining silhouettes, and along the female figure's proper left hand. The image was constructed in paint applied in thin layers of opaque underpaint along the blue skirt and final thin transparent glazing, depending on the intended effect. There appear to be artist's fingerprints along the man's beard and boy's hair.

The painting is signed in light-colored paint along the lower left corner but is undated. The "F" appears slightly cropped, suggesting the left panel edge was trimmed slightly.

No compositional changes are evident in the infrared images or X-radiograph.

The painting was cleaned and restored in 2009 and remains in a good state of preservation despite areas of thinness through the man's and boy's jackets.^[2]

Technical Summary Endnotes

1. The characterization of the wood is based on visual examination of the X-radiograph and panel reverse images by Ian Tyers. According to Tyers, the panel has good potential for dendrochronology. The upper arched edge could be examined, but it would be preferable if the lower shim could be removed.

2. Entry based on 2011 examination report by Kate Smith, paintings conservator, Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.
